Quarterly Commentary as at December 31, 2018

The U.S. Federal Reserve's (Fed's) gradual path of tightening monetary policy continued this quarter as the U.S. economy continued to show impressive momentum. The strength in the economy was broadly based, although some metrics began showing signs of slowing. The Fed's 25 basis-point hike during the fourth quarter was the fourth of the year, bringing the total to 100 bps (or 1%) of cumulative tightening, and more was promised for 2019. However, as the quarter progressed, optimism about economic output deteriorated as the global economy slowed, energy prices collapsed, trade tensions between the United States and China intensified and financial-market conditions weakened. This led to uncertainty regarding the Fed's next moves. Inflationary pressures retreated somewhat, underscoring the Fed's decision to signal a pause next year.

As a result of the 25 basis-point rate hike, U.S. money-market yields jumped between 25 and 40 basis points in the shorter maturities, while longer maturities increased by much less, reflecting a lack of concern about inflation. Activity in the Fund focused on maintaining short-term liquidity to quickly capture the effects of a rate hike, while occasionally investing further out along the yield-curve to lock in higher yields. The Fund's overall composition continued to favor securitized paper, although provincial paper took on more prominence relative to bank paper. The Fund's average term-to-maturity increased after the most recent rate hike, as the manager expected no further tightening for a prolonged period, and invested further out along the yield-curve.

The U.S. economy is still strong, but appears to be losing momentum. This puts the Fed's tightening pace into question as the Fed said it would reflect on the economy's performance before tightening further. This suggests that the steady increase in money-market rates will slow down or potentially stall. Accordingly, the manager expects to maintain a more neutral bias in managing the Fund, as opposed to being defensive.
