Quarterly Commentary as at March 31, 2018

Asian markets continued to build on their performance in 2017, led by China, Taiwan and South Korea. The macro environment – a stable Chinese economy, a gradual increase in commodity prices and a steady U.S. dollar – remains supportive of Asian equities. Japanese markets, however, recorded substantial losses in local currency terms as the yen rallied 5.6% on concerns that the Bank of Japan may pull back from its stimulus programme sooner than expected. We expect that U.S. fiscal unease and protectionism will lead to continued yen appreciation, which will be negative for Japanese corporates. Concerns about the continuing trade-tariff rhetoric between the U.S. and China are also mounting as the risk of tit-for-tat trade measures has increased.

European equities fell during the quarter as volatility returned to markets after strong performance in 2017. There were also signs of a slowdown in European economic growth and the positive economic growth shock predicted for 2018 has not materialized thus far. This has resulted in a reversal of the cyclical stock momentum with investors reverting to more defensive sectors. Global markets have also felt the effects of a rise in protectionist policies and fears of a trade war emanating from the U.S.

From an asset-allocation perspective, Information Technology was the biggest contributor to relative returns over the quarter with Utilities as the biggest detractor. Stock selection in the Financials and Health Care sectors was positive for performance while Telecommunication Services and Consumer Discretionary stocks had a negative impact on returns.

The best-performing stocks in the portfolio were Japanese furniture and home accessories company, Nitori Co. Ltd. and Irish airline, Ryanair DAC. Software publishing company, Sage Group plc, and Irish gaming company, Paddy Power Betfair plc, were the biggest drags on performance over the quarter.
