Quarterly Commentary as at June 30, 2017

The Canadian economy continued to strengthen in Q2, all but eliminating the need for the Bank of Canada (BoC) to reduce short-term interest rates. Yields trended lower in April and May, and bonds recovered most of the losses recorded following Trump's election in late 2016, as it appeared that the administration would struggle to get policies enacted. However, Canadian bond yields spiked up in June after the BoC hinted at hiking rates. In response, Canadian bonds underperformed their U.S. peers.

The Fund's performance benefited from an overweight allocation to investment-grade corporate bonds and provincial fixed-income securities, as investors sought higher-yielding assets that are perceived to have a degree of safety. Investments in higher-risk corporate debt also contributed to performance. The Fund benefited from higher income provided by these bonds, and from appreciation linked to optimism about global economic expansion. The Fund continued reducing exposure to these securities as the potential for further gains diminished.

It is expected that bond yields rise slowly as the global economic expansion and fading threat of disinflation have led major central banks to consider tighter monetary policies. In addition to hiking rates, it is expected that the U.S. Federal Reserve begins gradually reducing the amount of bonds on its balance sheet. Provided the strategy is executed carefully and with enough transparency, with other central banks continuing quantitative easing purchases it is not believed that the process should disrupt fixed-income markets. Long-maturity yields are likely to remain range-bound in the near term and move higher as growth and inflation firms. Any continued strength in non-government bonds may lead to further reductions and further overall reduction in portfolio risk over the second half of the year.
