Quarterly Commentary as at March 31, 2018

The main driver of bond returns this quarter was the U.S. Federal Reserve (Fed) decision to continue tightening monetary policy in line with a strengthening economy. U.S. Treasuries led a global bond sell-off in the first half of Q1, only to subsequently pare back losses as the fear of trade wars derailing global growth and rising volatility in equity markets sent investors seeking safety in government bonds. Other major government bond markets posted solid results while the U.S. ended with a loss.

Government of Canada bonds posted marginal gain for Q1. The Bank of Canada (BoC) raised short-term interest rates as expected in January; however, it remained cautious on further hikes, citing relatively high household debt levels, tighter mortgage regulations and uncertainty surrounding NAFTA negotiations. The yield curves continued to flatten with short-dated bond yields rising more than their long-maturity peers. As a result, the benchmark's positive performance was mostly from long-maturity bonds

Looking ahead, the global economy continues to expand at a healthy pace and policy tightening by major central banks is expected to pick up speed later this year, which is likely to push bond yields higher. The portfolio manager expects that the BoC's reluctance to hike rates will continue and that its decisions will be data-dependent. The Fed is expected to deliver at least two more rate hikes in 2018 and continues to scale back reinvesting in its portfolio of Treasuries and mortgage-backed securities. The portfolio manager expects economic growth to continue to support corporate earnings and therefore expects corporate bonds to outperform government bonds amid increasing risks associated with these positions.
