Quarterly Commentary as at December 31, 2017

The Canadian economy improved steadily during the quarter, but with inflation pressures under control, the Bank of Canada (BoC) refrained from tightening policy further. While optimism about U. S. economic growth led monetary authorities there to tighten again, Canadian concerns over NAFTA negotiations, forthcoming new mortgage lending rules, and household leverage all generated enough uncertainty over the effect on the Canadian economy as to keep the BoC from raising rates again. Yields closed the quarter higher in sympathy with higher yields in the U.S., which had just passed a corporate tax bill that promised to add to the momentum there.

Canadian money market rates increased approximately 0.15-0.20% from their quarter lows, as the market repriced prospects of a quicker BoC hike following some stronger than expected economic releases. The Fund's overall exposure to corporate and securitized paper remained unchanged. Average term to maturity was unchanged as uncertainty over the timing of the next hike compelled a balanced approach to portfolio maturities.

The BoC set out to take its time in tightening again, following the two quick rate hikes earlier in the previous quarter. Studying the effects of the last 2 rate hikes would take time, ostensibly keeping the BoC on the sidelines until spring. With evidence of stronger employment and recovery in business sentiment, however, the BoC's timetable may be accelerated somewhat, and a rate hike early in the New Year is more likely. Given that the Canadian economy is recovering, policy bias in Canada continues to be in the direction of higher rates, although the path of increases is expected to be uneven and unpredictable. Going forward, this uncertainty will necessitate a strategy combining liquidity with occasional forays out the yield curve to secure higher yields.
