Quarterly Commentary as at March 31, 2017

The Canadian economy recovered further during the quarter, reflecting a healthier labor market and improved business confidence. The Bank of Canada (BoC), however, looked through the strength, and viewed it as temporary, as economic slack in the Canadian economy remained significant. Despite Canadian data improving, a sidelined BoC prevented Canadian yields from materially increasing, as expectations of a rate hike were a year away.

Globally, central banks maintained their easing policy posture even though growth projections were upgraded, suggesting that the worst of the fallout from the global financial crisis is over. This was most evident in the U.S., where the Federal Reserve tightened policy by another 0.25% only three months after its last tightening. With U.S. labor markets recovering and confidence on the mend, more tightening has been factored in the U.S. over the next few months.

Canadian market rates increased slightly through the quarter, but by a much lower magnitude than in the U.S. The RBC Canadian money market funds' overall exposure to corporate and securitized paper increased as corporate issuance recovered somewhat. Average term to maturity remained at relatively higher levels, reflecting continued occasional investments further out the curve as the risk of tightening in Canada was very low.

As the Canadian economy recovers, pressure on the BoC's sidelined policy stance will intensify. With the U.S. already having tightened three times in a little over a year, the spillover of economic recovery into Canada may pressure yields up. As the U.S. economy is expected to gain momentum over the medium term, the economic benefit to Canada is also expected to grow, provided that trade flows are not restricted, which remains a potential risk given the U.S. administration's protectionist impulses. We anticipate that the next quarter will see Canadian monetary policy unchanged, and yields to be generally unaffected.
