Quarterly Commentary as at June 30, 2018

The Canadian economy decelerated during Q2, explaining the Bank of Canada's (BoC) reluctance to tighten as well as the uncertainty regarding Canada's trade relationship with the United States. U.S.-imposed tariffs on Canadian steel and aluminum prompted retaliatory tariffs on certain U.S. imports, raising the prospects of a trade war between the two countries.

Furthermore, a number of economic measures suggest the Canadian is economy growing, but weakly. The BoC maintained its position that higher interest rates were appropriate, but only on the condition that economic data supported such moves. More recently, the BoC appeared to signal that another rate hike was approaching as its business outlook survey suggested the second quarter in Canada picked up momentum again. Accordingly, market participants began pricing in the next tightening immediately.

Canadian money-market rates increased approximately 0.10-0.20% during the quarter, reflecting expectations that the BoC was considering tightening again. The Fund's overall exposure to corporate and securitized paper remained unchanged. Average term to maturity was managed more defensively with the manager accumulating shorter maturities, expecting that they would be rolled over at higher yields.

After a prolonged period of unchanged policy, the BoC appears ready to tighten again in light of growth and inflation measures gaining strength. The Canadian economy is growing and policy bias in Canada continues to be in the direction of higher rates, although the pace of tightening is expected to be very gradual. A number of concerns remain, however, that may temporarily stay the BoC's hand, such as the deteriorating trade relationship with the U.S. or prospects of a global trade war with the U.S. at the epicentre. Notwithstanding this, the manager expects to pursue a defensive approach in the Fund and then resume opportunistic term extension after tightening occurs.
