Quarterly Commentary as at March 31, 2017

Asset allocation was flat whereas security selection was a detractor from relative performance.

At the asset allocation level, our overweight position in Energy and underweight position in Health Care were the biggest contributors to relative performance while the overweight position in I.T. was the biggest detractor.

In terms of security selection, names within the Energy sector contributed most to relative performance whereas names within the I.T. sector detracted the most. Our zero holding of Exxon Mobil was the biggest single name contributor while our underweight position in Apple was the largest detractor.

The global economy continues to grow at a slow but sustained pace, leading indicators are positive, and recession signals are muted. The deflation trade has paused or even reversed somewhat as investors consider the likelihood of Trump's ability to deliver on his campaign promise to increase government spending. Highly stimulative monetary policies remain the norm outside the U.S. in the developed world, as growth and inflation are still uncomfortably low in Europe and Japan. Potential risks to the global economy include rising interest rates in the U.S., European politics and the recent escalation of tensions between U.S. and Russia following military action in Syria. We are also increasingly cautious given heightened geopolitical risks involving North Korea. Given this backdrop, the global economy could grow a bit slower in 2017 than we initially expected, but any fiscal boost would simply be pushed to 2018.

In Europe's current environment, domestically exposed stocks may return to favour, with those exhibiting highest potential growth in revenue emerging as winners. In Asia, economies with large trade surpluses versus the U.S. are most vulnerable – primarily the industrial exporters of North Asia given the possibility of a U.S. border-adjustment tax.
