Quarterly Commentary as at December 31, 2017

The quarter was characterized by continued investor appetite for emerging market assets, helped by improving global economic growth, low volatility and still-accommodative monetary policy in the developed world. Some currencies, such as those of Eastern Europe, have been supported by rising exports to Germany; while others (South Africa, Chile) have benefitted from lessened political risk after more market-friendly candidates were elected.

The Fund was positioned less heavily in Asia than its benchmark, a strategy that weighed on performance as those countries experienced stronger exports and improving economic data. Looking forward, focus will likely shift toward a heavy docket of elections, particularly in Latin America. A more restrictive liquidity environment, amid tightening by several of the world's major central banks, may also precipitate larger currency fluctuations. We are mindful that improving economic growth can continue to support emerging market currencies in the year ahead, but are wary of high levels of investor complacency. In the coming quarter, higher costs of borrowing and higher volatility are likely to punish currencies of nations with large fiscal and trade deficits. We continue to favour currencies with stable funding dynamics, attractive growth profiles and positive reform momentum.
