Quarterly Commentary as at March 31, 2018

U.S. cosmetics producer Estée Lauder was the biggest contributor to relative returns in Q1. The stock has had a very strong run with demand from China, e-commerce and travel retail driving sales growth. U.S. online retailer and cloud computing provider Amazon returned almost 24% in Q1 after strong growth and results; it also benefited from the announcement of new business initiatives such as healthcare distribution.

South African media conglomerate Naspers was the biggest detractor from relative returns in Q1. The stock fell after Naspers sold a 2% stake in Chinese media giant Tencent. There was disappointment in some quarters that the USD10bn proceeds were not going to be returned to investors but would be redeployed in some of Naspers' other businesses. Paddy Power Betfair suffered from weaker performance after changes to senior management and a poor response from some investors to the company's increased investment plans which it is thought will hit shorter-term revenues.

Q1 started strongly but fragmented in February with markets selling off in concert, driven by volatility trade unwinds and valuation concerns. March was also negative with concerns around the re-emergence of protectionism, especially between the U.S. and China. There was also a reappraisal of valuations in the burgeoning technology sector in light of some firms' cavalier attitudes towards customer data. The U.S. dollar was generally weak, despite the stimulatory potential of president Trump's tax cuts, a strong economy and rising interest rates.

As always the RBC Global Equity team remains committed to the discovery of companies that we deem to be future success stories. We are constantly searching for compelling long-term opportunities at the right valuations whilst avoiding those businesses that are overvalued or optically cheap but fundamentally flawed.
