Quarterly Commentary as at September 30, 2017

The U.S. stock market made progress again this past quarter. Strong performances from the Information Technology, Energy and Telecommunication Services sectors powered the advance, while the Consumer Discretionary and Consumer Staples sectors were detractors.

The S&P 500 (CAD) is up since the November election, but corporate fundamentals rather than politics have been the driving force for the market. After three years of essentially flat earnings, the S&P 500 is expected to generate roughly 10% earnings growth in 2017. Our indicators suggest that the odds of a recession remain fairly low, but the risks of a correction have increased.

During the quarter, security selection and underweight positioning to the struggling Consumer Discretionary sector aided returns. An overweight position in Delphi Automotive boosted performance as the company focuses on its software capabilities. In Industrials, the overweight position to Boeing has lifted performance as the company has been cutting its costs in an effort to improve profit and cash flow.

Conversely, our overweight allocation and security selection in Consumer Staples was a detractor. An overweight position in Altria hindered returns as the U.S. Food and Drug Administration announced intentions to limit nicotine levels in tobacco products.

Stocks continue to be supported by a global synchronized expansion and renewed corporate-profit growth around the world. With many equity markets at or near all-time highs, investors are rightly concerned about the sustainability of the bull market in equities. While stocks are not as cheap as they were when the cycle began, they remain somewhat attractive. Markets have benefited from rising earnings and price-to-earnings ratios through this bull market, but earnings rather than valuations may now be the force needed to propel the market higher.
