Quarterly Commentary as at June 30, 2017

The U.S. stock market continued to move higher in Q2, extending the rally that began in early 2016. The quarter featured some deterioration in the economic data in the U.S. which led to lower interest rates, flatter yield curves, a drop in oil prices and a decline in the U.S. dollar. Despite the weaker than expected economic data, corporate earnings results came in ahead of expectations with Q1 earnings rising over 14% versus a year ago. The growth rate of the aggregate dividend for the S&P 500 was 7.4%, a very solid result.

Telecommunication Services was the worst performing sector during the period as competitive pressures weighed on the results of all the carriers. Energy was the second worst sector due to continued weakness in the oil price. Investor sentiment toward the group is brutal as OPEC's production cut appears to be ineffective and the productivity improvements of U.S. shale producers continue to surprise on the upside. An overweight in Energy detracted from performance, however it was partially offset by overweight positions in Health Care, Industrials and Financials, the top three performers during the quarter.

In our view, recent economic data suggests the global economy is still expanding, slowly and from a low level. Earnings growth turned positive in Q3 last year and we expect further earnings improvements to drive markets higher in 2017. If the Trump administration enacts protectionist trade policies, we would expect corporate earnings to weaken and the stock market to come under pressure. Prospects for major tax reform and a huge infrastructure bill seem remote so we are not factoring these outcomes into our base case. We expect significant regulatory changes, particularly in the Energy and Financials sectors, and cash repatriation to provide support for growth in 2018.
