Quarterly Commentary as at March 31, 2017

The U.S. stock market continued to surge higher in Q1, extending the rally that began a little over a year ago. Much like the quarter that preceded it, this most recent period featured strong rotations in sectors and style leadership as investors weighed the likelihood of the individual elements of President Trump's legislative agenda coming to fruition. In the previous quarter, cyclical sectors outperformed the market as investors focused on the potential pro-growth policies of the new administration. Furthermore, stocks with strong value characteristics outperformed stocks with superior growth traits, as investors were less inclined to pay for growth in the cyclical rally that commenced after the Brexit. In Q1, the return relationship between sectors was not as pronounced; however, we did see sectors like Health Care, Consumer Staples, and Utilities more than keep up with their cyclical counterparts.

Energy was the worst performing sector in the U.S. due to weakness in oil prices in March, concern about OPEC discipline, and a rising rig count. An overweight in Energy detracted from performance, however it was partially offset by an overweight in Health Care, which was a top performer during the quarter. We continue to believe in the long-term success of Energy companies with strong, sustainable balance sheets, while also exhibiting healthy levels of free cash flow.

Market performance going forward will depend on tangible evidence in the form of increased economic activity and better-than-expected corporate earnings. While some of the market's advance must be attributed to the anticipation of pro-growth policy action, the fundamentals are also doing their part to drive the market higher. Surveys of U.S. economic activity are at a six-year high and the new-orders and inventory components indicate that production should keep improving.
