Quarterly Commentary as at December 31, 2018

The S&P 500 Index was not exempt from the most recent sell-off as tighter financial conditions, rising protectionism and slowing global growth were top of mind for investors. While analysts expect a more moderate pace of earnings growth in 2019, we think estimates are still at risk of being revised lower. Our view is based on the fact that economic growth, while still decent, is slowing and that margins have little room for improvement. Overall, our models suggest a low chance of recession over the next year, but the risk is rising.

During the quarter, an overweight of NextEra Energy was a boost. NextEra is one of the U.S.'s largest providers of electricity. Investors have flocked to utility stocks during the market volatility, but NextEra has further potential upside through its acquisition of Gulf Power. Conversely, we didn't hold Verizon Communications for part of the quarter, and it had strong performance through October and November. Verizon is also a defensive stock, currently making network investments while seeing strength in conventional wireless.

While our base case is for stocks to rise very modestly over the next year, there are several scenarios that could lead to different outcomes. A policy mistake by the U.S. Federal Reserve (Fed) (raising rates too fast) or an escalation of protectionist moves by the Trump administration (subjecting more goods to tariffs or raising the tariff rate) are the most likely causes of a downturn given the potential for both to stamp out the expansion. A possible upside scenario is that the expansion remains intact through 2021, perhaps because the Fed pauses its rate-hike cycle soon or the Trump administration comes to a trade agreement with China.
