Quarterly Commentary as at September 30, 2017

The U.S. stock market made progress again this past quarter. Strong performances from the Information Technology, Energy and Telecommunication Services sectors powered the advance, while the Consumer Discretionary and Consumer Staples sectors were the primary drag.

The S&P 500 is up since the November election, but corporate fundamentals rather than politics have been the driving force for the market. After three years of essentially flat earnings, the S&P 500 is expected to generate roughly 10% earnings growth in 2017. Our indicators suggest that the odds of a recession remain fairly low, but the risks of correction have increased.

During the quarter, the Fund was aided by the Consumer Staples and Utilities sectors, while Energy was the largest drag. Underweight positioning and security selection boosted returns in Consumer Staples as consumers disrupt traditional retailers by changing the way they shop and what they want to buy. In Utilities, the fund benefitted from overweight position, NRG Energy as the company shared transformation plans.

In contrast, security selection in Energy was a drag. While oil prices rebounded over the quarter, they do remain below our estimates for the marginal cost of supply.

Stocks continue to be supported by a global synchronized expansion and renewed corporate-profit growth around the world. With many equity markets at or near all-time highs, investors are rightly concerned about the sustainability of the bull market in equities. While stocks are not as cheap as they were when the cycle began, they remain somewhat attractive relative to fixed income. Markets have benefited from rising earnings and price-to-earnings ratios through this bull market, but earnings rather than valuations may now be the force needed to propel the market higher.
