Quarterly Commentary as at December 31, 2018

From a factor perspective, our exposure to lower-beta companies was the largest positive contributor to performance. Value was the next largest performance contributor, as was our exposure to stocks with high Financial Strength. The largest factor detractors from performance were our exposure to smaller-capitalization stocks.

From a sector perspective, allocation effects were negative and selection effects were positive. Healthcare and Consumer Staples were the top contributors to allocation effects. Meanwhile, Energy and Information Technology were the top detractors. Healthcare and Energy were the top contributors to selection effects. Meanwhile, Consumer Staples and Communication Services were the top detractors.

It is the policy of the Fund to maintain currency hedges at all times in order to neutralize exchange-rate movements between the U.S. dollar and the Canadian dollar. This policy had a negative effect on performance during the period.

Above all else, we believe that long-term success comes from building a portfolio using proven stock-selection factors—measured using key selection criteria like quality, valuation, and momentum. Based on these key themes, the strategy is very well-positioned relative to the overall market. The portfolio's companies have higher momentum, lower debt ratios, and trade at deep discounts across several valuation factors. They are also less dilutive to shareholders than the average company in the index. We believe that the portfolio continues to represent a unique opportunity versus the benchmark.
