Quarterly Commentary as at June 30, 2017

The challenge for the Bank of Canada is that as the growth backdrop has improved, inflation has retreated. As of May, headline consumer price inflation was a mere 1.3% y/y, with various measure of core inflation in the same neighborhood. We concede that inflation is likely to remain weak for a bit longer but would argue that today's low rates also represent an exceedingly easy comparison a year from now. It is partly why we see inflation accelerating from 1.9% in 2017 to 2.2% next year. Ultimately, the key argument for a rate hike in 2017 is not that we fear an inflation event around the corner but rather that the economy is no longer in crisis mode, so neither should monetary policy.

Industrials, Consumer Discretionary, and Telecommunications Services were the best performers by contribution to return during Q2. Energy, Materials, and Financials were the 3 worst performing sectors by contribution to return during the same period.

As we look forward into the second half of 2017, the growth component of the reflation thematic continues to show solid momentum. Global inflation, has taken a pause at midyear, preventing the declaration by central bankers that we've achieved healthy levels they target. The base effects from the recovery in energy prices from early 2016 have passed through, and now are a drag anew on inflation as oil prices have plunged 20% from a March high. As such, the synchronized rise in both growth and inflation has given way for global equities to continue to move higher: moderate continued global expansion with a more subdued level of inflation. The continued positive trajectory of economic growth should keep corporate earnings on track while the absence of upward inflation pressure will temper the appetites of central bankers to tighten financial conditions.
