Quarterly Commentary as at March 31, 2017

U.S. computer games developer Activision Blizzard, on the back of strong numbers, was the biggest contributor this quarter. The second was Kite Pharma, a U.S. pharmaceutical company that concluded a successful trial of its main cancer treatment, followed by Indian HDFC Bank as realizations grew that India's demonetization program should prove beneficial to Indian banks.

One of the detractors to relative performance was not holding Apple, which performed strongly on anticipated demand for the latest iPhone iteration.

The driver of strong equity performance is unclear, especially in a quarter where we have witnessed an average year's worth of returns in just three months. Clearly the growth outlook is improving, although we are unsure if this will be enough to sustain market returns at similar levels in coming quarters.

There are some obvious roadblocks ahead. It is unlikely that the Trump administration will be able to legislate as radically or as quickly as initially thought – China still has to grapple with a loose money supply and an ongoing property bubble, and Europe is veiled in political uncertainty with critical elections on the horizon in France and Germany, alongside negotiations for the U.K.'s exit from the European Union.

As always the Global Equity team attempts to navigate this uncertain backdrop by investing only in companies deemed to be successful in the future. We are constantly searching for compelling long-term opportunities at the right valuations, while avoiding businesses that are overvalued or optically cheap, but fundamentally flawed.
