Quarterly Commentary as at June 30, 2017

In a market like Canada, which tends to be very top heavy and dominated in weight by a small group of stocks, we will usually look more like an equally-weighted market than a cap-weighted benchmark. This continued to be true in the Q2, when we had an underweight exposure to the size factor. We were hurt from our smaller cap orientation. Our overweight allocation to the value factor was the largest contributor to excess returns, adding 1.62% to excess return for Q2. Positive value effects were overwhelmed by negative contributions from size, quality, industry, and stock specific exposures.

Overall sector allocation effects contributed to returns while overall security selection detracted from returns during the quarter. Specifically, an underweight allocation to Energy and an overweight allocation to Industrials contributed to returns while an underweight allocation to Telecommunication Services and an overweight allocation to Materials hurt returns. Security selection within Materials and Consumer Discretionary aided performance while security selection within Health Care and Industrials detracted from returns.

Our research leads us to believe that exposure to yield, value, momentum, and quality drive future outperformance. We consistently avoid sectors and industries that exhibit unfavorable characteristics to these themes and overweight areas of the market that rank favorably. Historically, international stocks with the cheapest valuations, along with stocks with the highest momentum, have provided higher returns relative to the market.
