Quarterly Commentary as at December 31, 2018

From a factor perspective, our exposure to smaller companies detracted from returns. Exposures to our Momentum and Shareholder Yield theme had the most significant positive impact of our key selection factors. Performance of our quality themes was mixed but detracted in aggregate. Notably, stocks with strong Earnings Growth and Earnings Quality performed poorly.

From a sector perspective, allocation and selection effects were negative. Utilities and Financials were the top contributors to allocation effects. Meanwhile, Energy and Health Care were the top detractors. Communication Services and Energy were the top contributors to selection effects. Meanwhile, Consumer Discretionary and Consumer Staples were the top detractors.

From a country perspective, sector allocation effects were positive contributors while selection effects detracted from returns. An overweight in Norway and an underweight in Switzerland were the largest allocation detractors, meanwhile overweights in Russia and Turkey were the largest contributors. Selection effects detracted within the United States and United Kingdom, while those within Spain and the Australia were positive.

Our focus on value, yield, momentum and quality has allowed us to construct a portfolio that trades at substantial discounts on various valuation metrics. Our research of individual stock data leads us to believe that value, yield, momentum, and quality are themes that will be critical to future outperformance. We consistently avoid sectors and industries with unfavorable characteristics and overweight areas of the market that we deem favorable. Given the portfolio's positioning relative to its benchmark—measured by key characteristics we use in our stock selection process—we believe the portfolio is well positioned for the rest of 2019.
