Quarterly Commentary as at March 31, 2018

The high-yield market had a particularly challenging first quarter as rising interest rates, increasing corporate defaults, persistent outflows from the corporate-bond asset class, a sharp spike in equity-market volatility and ongoing geopolitical risk created a stormy backdrop for credit markets. Simultaneously, high-yield bond valuations were near the most expensive levels seen post-crisis, leaving investors little margin of protection. Nevertheless, the high-yield market's retracement thus far has been fairly orderly with only modest declines in most market sectors. Thanks to its unique portfolio structure, PH&N High Yield Bond Fund held fairly steady through this challenging first quarter.

With the February-March sell-off, the overall high-yield market currently stands at approximately 6.375% yield with an average spread of about +380 basis points. This is still expensive by historical standards and leaves the market somewhat vulnerable if this is, in fact, the late stage of the current credit cycle.

In response to this more dangerous phase of the cycle, the Fund has started to reduce risk more proactively by trimming longer-dated and/or higher-beta positions. This risk reduction has added to the Fund's already-large foundation of cash and near-cash substitutes, which may pressure near-term performance if markets temporarily rebound later this year, but will ultimately provide stability and liquidity as we potentially enter a bear credit market in the next 12 to 24 months. The Fund continues to hold core positions in lower-beta names at decent running yields and a few select opportunistic positions that could provide capital appreciation. We believe this combined portfolio can achieve reasonable returns, even in a more challenging credit environment.

Despite caution regarding the overall high-yield asset class at this stage of the cycle, high-yield bonds (correctly and tactically managed with a focus on lower-risk/shorter-duration instruments) can still play an important role for fixed-income investors in a rising interest-rate environment. Furthermore, we believe the Fund's unique structure and opportunistic approach to managing credit risk will provide reasonable risk-adjusted returns over the tricky phase of the cycle that may be approaching.
