Quarterly Commentary as at June 30, 2017

The U.S. Federal Reserve continued on its hiking path with another 0.25% lift in June. This move follows recent hikes from March 2017 and December 2016, and brings the Federal Funds Rate to 1.25%, with the possibility of further hikes in the near future. This trend is good news for savers who had to endure near-zero rates on U.S. savings for seven years before December 2015, when rates started slowly moving up (the Federal Funds Rate serves as the base for U.S. money market funds).

The Fund continues to maximize yield by focusing on securities that pay a higher rate than U.S.

Government T-bills, which includes corporate notes, bankers' acceptances, asset-backed commercial paper (ABCP) and to a lesser degree, the U.S. dollar-denominated debt of Canadian provinces. The Fund keeps a high allocation to bank-sponsored ABCP, which comes with an attractive yield compared to many other securities, and still meets the Fund's mandated high threshold for safety and security. As always, safety of principal and return of capital is not compromised and remains the primary objective of the Fund.
