Quarterly Commentary as at June 30, 2017

The Fund had decent returns this quarter and finished ahead of its benchmark, the FTSE TMX Canada Real Return Bond Index, following two previous challenging quarters. Real interest rates fell marginally, but do not have to change much to affect returns given the Fund's long duration. Looking closer, the real yield curve flattened, causing short real rates (five-year) to increase and long real rates (30-year) to decrease. The Fund was well positioned for this flattening move, and it contributed to relative outperformance versus its benchmark. Inflation, to which the principal amounts of the bonds in the Fund are linked, faded somewhat over the quarter. Canada's headline inflation (CPI) dropped to 1.3% year over year after reaching 2.1% in the first quarter. The Bank of Canada (BoC), however, appears to be viewing this decline as temporary, as speculation builds that the BoC will increase the overnight target rate later this year. For investors in the Fund, real purchasing power will be maintained over the long term regardless of the magnitude of actual inflation, thanks to the linkage to CPI.

Strategically, in addition to being well positioned for the flattening yield curve, we continued to take advantage of "inefficiencies" in the real return bond market, including price differences amongst the various maturities of real return bonds (RRBs). These strategies contributed to performance over the quarter. The Fund also maintained an allocation to provincial and corporate RRBs to enhance yield, although these positions are constrained by tight supply in these sectors. With the Fund's real yield at approximately 0.5% – still low by historical standards – it remains susceptible to negative performance if real rates continue to rise.
