Quarterly Commentary as at December 31, 2017

Long-term real-return bond yields ended the fourth quarter approximately 0.3% lower than they started, driven primarily by cautious statements from the Bank of Canada (BoC) made early in the quarter. Bond prices move in the opposite direction of yields; therefore, PH&N Inflation-Linked Bond Fund earned solid absolute returns as a result of the Fund's sensitivity to changes in real interest rates. Headline inflation (CPI), to which the principal amount of the Fund's bonds is linked, ended November at 2.1% on a year-over-year basis. At this level, CPI is trending at the mid-point of the BoC's target range of between 1% and 3%. For investors in the Fund, real purchasing power will be maintained over the long term regardless of the magnitude of actual inflation, thanks to linkage to CPI.

The Fund's performance exceeded that of its benchmark. Contributing to this result were tactical positions used to take advantage of inefficiencies in the real-return bond market, including price differences among the various maturities of real-return bonds. Additionally, the Fund was able to benefit from correctly anticipating changes in real yields over the quarter. The Fund's allocation to provincial real-return bonds, which enhance yield, increased to a level greater than that of the benchmark. While this is an attractive sector, a limited supply of bonds available constrains the size of these positions in the Fund. With the Fund's real yield at approximately 0.6% – still low by historical standards – the Fund remains susceptible to negative performance should real rates move higher.
