Quarterly Commentary as at June 30, 2017

The Bank of Canada (BoC) announced that the emergency easing associated with plunging energy prices two years ago may no longer be appropriate. The Canadian economy had been recovering strongly, and no longer needed the ultra-easy policy that was in place since 2015. Up to that point, money market rates held steady, with little impulse for change given the view that a policy shift was a story for 2018. This changed with the BoC's announcement, as rates shot up in expectation of a rate hike. Supporting the idea of removing the excessively easy monetary policy in Canada was a firming global and U.S. economy, resulting in U.S. administered rates rising again, a third time since late last year.

Canadian market rates increased approximately 0.10% - 0.35% through Q2, as participants priced in a 0.25% hike. In the Fund, provincial paper remained the most widely held investment.

Average term to maturity was cut back, reflecting the expectation of BoC tightening. The Fund held a larger proportion of longer dated investments due to the earlier expectation of no change in policy this year, and this was responsible for the Fund's average term remaining relatively higher.

The BoC's announcement ushers in the end of overly easy policy, and suggests the BoC is looking to reclaim the 0.50% of easing it executed after energy prices collapsed. Once that is done, we expect the BoC to reassess the state of the Canadian economy before deciding on continued tightening. With the Canadian economy on firmer footing, aided by recoveries in the U.S. and global economies, the bias now turns to retreating from easy policy in Canada, and as such a more defensive management strategy will be in force for the Canadian funds.
