Quarterly Commentary as at December 31, 2017

Canadian short term bond yields remained range bound early in the quarter as inflation pressures were subdued, and the Bank of Canada (BoC) signaled no further tightening action in order to gauge the effects of its last two rate hikes. By quarter end however, in sympathy with rising U.S. treasury yields, prospects of solid economic growth in North America leading to higher inflation pressures had Canadian short bond yields jumping higher.

Bond yields increased approximately 0.10-0.15% across short maturities, while longer maturities fell in accordance with weak inflation pressures, resulting in a flattening of the yield curve.

The Fund maintained its defensive posture as strengthening global economies increased the prospects of inflation pressures building, and central banks accelerating their tightening program. The BoC is likely to tighten further while the U.S. Federal Reserve already announced its intent to tighten three more times over the next year. This bearish outlook for policy informed the Fund's defensive stance; lower exposure to government bonds, lower duration relative to benchmark, and a slightly higher position in corporate paper, which served as a damper against the negative effect of higher government yields on the Fund.

The direction for monetary policy in Canada is tighter, and short bond yields are likely to gradually climb. While the Bank of Canada is widely expected to tighten further, timing is expected to be a source of uncertainty. Being data dependent, the BoC is awaiting inflation pressures to stir, or evidence of excessive activity eventually leading to higher inflation pressures, before tightening again. This may take some time, and there could be a prolonged period of no further action. Nonetheless, the outlook is for bond yields to climb, which will keep the Fund in a defensive stance over the medium term.
