Quarterly Commentary as at March 31, 2018

A steadily improving Canadian economy prompted the Bank of Canada (BoC) to tighten once by 0.25% during the quarter, building on rate hikes from last year. Recovering Canadian labour markets and solid growth in the United States allowed for the rate hike, although the BoC was clear in pointing out that, while further rate hikes would be necessary, it would proceed with caution as uncertainty over the U.S.-Canadian trade relationship weighed on the economy. Other concerns keeping the BoC cautious were high levels of consumer debt in Canada, a slowing housing market and weak inflation metrics. By quarter end, the economy's pace looked to be decelerating, which underscored the BoC's patience in maintaining its gradual tightening path.

Canadian money-market rates increased approximately 0.10% during the quarter, reflecting a realization that the pace of policy tightening would slow considerably. The Fund's overall exposure to corporate and securitized paper remained unchanged. Average term to maturity steadily increased as the BoC signaled that it was in no hurry to tighten again after its January announcement, allowing some longer investments at higher yields.

Given that the Canadian economy is recovering, policy bias in Canada continues to be in the direction of higher rates, although the BoC's pace of tightening is expected to be slower and dependent on future economic data. Of particular concern to policy makers in the near term is the threat of a trade war between the United States and China, ongoing uncertainty over NAFTA negotiations, increased consumer debt loads and a slowing housing market, all of which weigh on the prospects of Canadian economic growth. Under the circumstances, the portfolio manager expects to maintain a balanced approach to the Fund, balancing more liquidity with occasional investments further out on the curve at higher yields.
