Quarterly Commentary as at September 30, 2017

The global acceleration in economic growth that began last year has been largely sustained. The need for extreme monetary stimulus is fading and central banks including the U.S. Federal Reserve and the Bank of Canada are gradually shifting toward tighter policy.

Returns on global government bonds were low to slightly negative during the period. U.S. bond yields rose during the period amid economic optimism after reversing declines in August and early September that had been due to a mix of safe-haven concerns including uncertainty over tax policy, fears of a U.S. government shutdown and nuclear tensions with North Korea. Emerging-market bonds continued to enjoy strong returns in the period, propelled by the positive economic outlook and perceptions that Fed rate hikes would not significantly hinder most emerging-market economies.

Returns were aided by the RBC Global High Yield Bond Fund and the RBC Global Corporate Bond Fund. However, performance was negatively affected by the RBC Emerging Markets Foreign Exchange Fund and the RBC Emerging Markets Bond Fund.

The portfolio manager expects global bond yields to rise slowly in coming quarters. The global economic expansion and firming inflation have led major central banks to consider tighter monetary policies. The heightened global indebtedness as well as regulatory and private demand for developed-market government bonds could keep bond yields from moving too high, too quickly. Any surge in bond yields would provide opportunities to accumulate bonds at more attractive rates.
