Quarterly Commentary as at March 31, 2018

High-yield bonds, despite outperforming investment-grade bonds, had a negative return in Q1 as the market contended with both rising U.S. government bond yields and higher premiums required by investors to invest in lower-rated corporate bonds. The higher-quality and, thus, more interest-rate-sensitive segments of the corporate bond market underperformed the lower-rated segments. Investors had to deal with volatile stock markets, the Trump Administration's revolving door, concerns over global trade wars and a new Chairman of the U.S. Federal Reserve. Meanwhile, key supports for the high-yield market remained in place. Credit conditions were benign, corporate health continued to improve slightly, the net supply of newly issued bonds remained low, the price of oil continued to recover and the corporate default rate, while higher than at year-end, remained low.

The Fund maintained its overall defensive positioning during the quarter by keeping the credit quality of the portfolio high and used its cash position to buy high-yield bonds that fell in price. Compared to its benchmark, the Fund was supported by its exposure to investment-grade and Canadian high-yield bonds but negatively affected by its exposure to specific U.S. issuers.

Demand for yield and a healthy economic backdrop should continue to support corporate bonds. Given that central banks are leaning toward tighter monetary policies, we believe that high-yield corporate bonds remain attractive relative to other fixed-income assets; however, future returns will likely be lower than in the recent past as possible headwinds emerge. This extended credit cycle may continue for a while yet. We intend to closely monitor the credit quality of the portfolio and look to add attractively valued bonds as they become available.
