Quarterly Commentary as at March 31, 2017

The three most common exposures in our portfolio are large positive exposures to the Value and Momentum factors, and a negative exposure to the Size factor.

The Momentum factor has thus far bounced back, following a very bad 2016 when Momentum underperformed by 17.6%. Most of the strong performance of the Momentum factor resulted from the fact that it kept you OUT of Energy sector. The sector was by far the worst performer across the Canadian market in Q1. The Momentum factor is useful in two ways: finding trends which tend to persist (to the portfolio's benefit) and avoiding stocks or entire sectors with very poor recent trends. This second "negative" aspect of Momentum was more important during Q1.

Using the Value factor also steered the portfolio away from Energy, which continued to look expensive to start the year. While Value did bias the portfolio away from Energy—which helped performance—performance of Value as a factor or category was held back by allocations to Consumer Discretionary—like Yellow Pages—which lagged. For the quarter, Value was effectively flat. Cheap stocks performed roughly in line with the overall market.

Our research of individual stock data leads us to believe that Value, Momentum, and Quality are themes that are critically important to future outperformance. We consistently avoid sectors and industries that exhibit unfavorable characteristics, and hone in on areas of the market that are favorable in the ways we deem relevant. Historically, Canadian stocks with the cheapest valuations provided an additional 6.6% of return relative to the market while stocks with stronger Momentum added an additional 8.0%. Given the portfolio's positioning relative to its benchmark—measured by key characteristics we use in our stock selection process—we believe the portfolio is well situated for the rest of 2017.
