Quarterly Commentary as at March 31, 2018

In U.S. equity markets, an aggressive sell-off in the Technology sector in March punctuated a volatile first quarter. In many respects, January looked to be an extension of 2017 with both large-cap and growth stocks leading performance of the Index. February, in contrast, saw a return of volatility that persisted through the end of the quarter.

The Technology sector played an outsized role in both the early run-up and later decline in the Index in the quarter. Weakness in Facebook Inc. shares led the decline as the company revealed it had unwittingly provided the personal data of 50 million users to a consulting firm, opening it up to regulatory scrutiny.

From a style perspective, small-cap stocks outperformed large-cap stocks in the quarter as announced tariffs and possible retaliation were seen as more threatening to large multinational firms than smaller, domestically oriented firms.

The top three performing sectors were Information

Technology, Consumer Discretionary and Financials, which all contributed to returns. The bottom three performing sectors were Consumer Staples, Energy and Telecommunication Services.

Entering the second quarter of 2018, investors face a more uncertain investment landscape compared to the close of 2017. Since then, a bevy of new concerns have come to light which, in our view, will need to be overcome if equity markets are to advance in 2018. Despite first-quarter losses for global equities, the positive economic growth and earnings trends that provided foundation for 15 consecutive monthly gains in global equities through January appear intact. Expectations for 2018 corporate-earnings growth accelerated in the first quarter with both U.S. and overall developed-market earnings expected to advance beyond previous December estimates. We expect that U.S. growth and inflation will continue to advance at a pace consistent with at least three U.S. Federal Reserve rate increases in 2018.
