Quarterly Commentary as at March 31, 2017

The Federal Reserve (Fed) delivered a "dovish" hike at its March meeting-especially relative to the hawkish rhetoric that preceded it-by not increasing the number of rate rises anticipated this year. The statement maintained a positive characterization of the economy with respect to the labor market and spending while also adding that "business fixed investment appears to have firmed somewhat".

There were no material changes to the summary of economic projections. The growth projection for 2018 rose one-tenth while the long-run (full-employment) unemployment rate fell one-tenth to 4.7%. Headline PCE inflation projections were unchanged. The median estimate for the federal funds rate in 2019 shifted one-tenth higher to 3.0% while the long-run equilibrium interest rate remained at 3.0%.

Information Technology, Health Care and

Consumer Staples sectors were the strongest last quarter by contribution to return. Energy, Telecommunications Services and Real Estate sectors all underperformed by comparison.

The first quarter of 2017 has provided investors very little to complain about. From an economic perspective, there is increasing evidence the global macro environment is improving. Likewise, the macro trend seems poised to continue, as the Citi Economic Surprise indices for both developed and emerging markets are both at multi-year highs. The ongoing strength of the economic data should enable progress towards monetary policy normalization despite various uncertainties with the Fed leading other central banks. Moreover, an uptick in global growth may help mute negative responses brought on by policy uncertainty in the U.S. and abroad. Still, with such a rosy backdrop, market sentiment now leans decidedly bullish.
