Quarterly Commentary as at September 30, 2017

Information Technology, Health Care and Financials sectors were the top performing sectors by contribution to return in Q3. On the other hand, Consumer Staples, Real Estate and Utilities are the 3 bottom performing sectors. Canadian investors that hedged their currency exposure did not benefit from the U.S. dollar's appreciation against the Canadian dollar.

Output disruptions caused by Hurricanes Harvey and Irma will likely depress Q3, then "catchup" production and rebuilding of homes and infrastructure will boost Q4. This year's improvement reflects slightly smaller drags from inventories and international trade, and a pick-up in business fixed investment caused by the rebound in oil prices and the associated revival of the energy-related mining sector.

The outlook for 2018 depends critically on fiscal policy. In the absence of any stimulus, we would still expect a slight acceleration of growth and gathering momentum in the mining and manufacturing sectors. The two most commonly used measures of inflation are behaving quite differently right now. Headline consumer price (CPI) inflation is trending higher as oil prices recover from their early 2016 low. Meanwhile, core inflation (which excludes food and energy) is swinging around. We expect core inflation to reaccelerate to 2.0% by the end of next year, as the effects of these factors drop out of the year-over-year calculation, and the labor market continues to tighten. However, we do not expect a major inflation event, because the relationship between resource utilization and inflation appears to have diminished appreciably since the 1980s.

Despite heightened geopolitical intrigue with North Korea, a series of devastating hurricanes in August and September and a firming outlook for policy tightening, market volatility levels closed Q3 near 24 year lows. Near dormant prospects for expansionary fiscal policy in the U.S. have been revived after months of ineffective action by the Republican led U.S. government on health care has shifted to talk of an earnings friendly tax cut.
