Quarterly Commentary as at June 30, 2017

Positive impacts were driven primarily by our overweight allocation to the momentum factor, which added 0.90%. Our underweight allocation to the size factor also aided returns by 0.60%. An underweight exposure to the market factor was the largest factor detractor from realtive returns at -0.73%.

Overall allocation effects and security selection effects detracted from returns for Q2. An underweight allocation to Utilities aided returns while an overweight allocation to Materials and an underweight allocation to Health Care hurt returns. Security selection within Materials contributed to performance while security selection within Consumer Discretionary, Utilities, and Telecommunication Services detracted from performance.

From a country perspective, overall allocation effects and security selection effects detracted from performance. An overweight allocation to Australia and an underweight allocation to France hurt returns while an overweight allocation to Austria contributed to returns. Security selection within Australia, the United Kingdom, and the Netherlands contributed to performance while security selection within Japan, Israel, and Norway hurt performance.

Our research leads us to believe that exposure to yield, value, momentum, and quality drive future outperformance. We consistently avoid sectors and industries that exhibit unfavorable characteristics to these themes and overweight areas of the market that rank favorably. Historically, international stocks with the cheapest valuations, along with stocks with the highest momentum, have provided higher returns relative to the market.
