Quarterly Commentary as at September 30, 2017

The three most common exposures in our Fund are large positive exposure to the value factor, a neutral exposure to the momentum factor, and a negative exposure to the size factor. While we will always place large bets on the value and momentum factors, the size factor exposure may be less consistent. In constructing the Fund, after setting our investible universe, we ignore market capitalization as a factor. In a market like Canada, which tends to be very top heavy and dominated in weight by a small group of stocks, this means that we will usually look more like an equally-weighted market than a cap-weighted benchmark. This continued to be true in the third quarter, when we had an underweight exposure to the size factor. We were hurt from our smaller cap orientation. Our overweight allocation to the value factor was the largest contributor to excess returns for the third quarter. Positive value effects were overwhelmed by negative contributions from size, momentum, and industry exposures.

Overall sector allocation and security selection effects detracted from returns during Q3. An overweight allocation to Consumer Discretionary aided returns while an underweight allocation to Energy and an overweight allocation to Health Care detracted. Security selection within Industrials, Consumer Discretionary, and Utilities contributed to performance while security selection within Health Care, Energy, and Information Technology detracted.

Our research of individual stock data leads us to believe that Value, Momentum, and Quality are themes that are critically important to future outperformance. We consistently avoid sectors and industries that exhibit unfavorable characteristics, and hone in on areas of the market that are favorable in the ways we deem relevant. Given the portfolio's positioning relative to its benchmark—measured by key characteristics we use in our stock selection process—we believe the portfolio is well situated for the remainder of 2017.
