Commentary as at June 30, 2019

The Canadian economy decelerated early in the period, making the Bank of Canada (the "BOC") less inclined to pursue interest-rate increases and instead delay rate hikes until there was evidence of faster domestic growth. More broadly, the global economy slowed in the first quarter, as trade frictions between the U.S. and China intensified, the eurozone economy slowed and the U.K. struggled to resolve Brexit. The U.S. Federal Reserve was under pressure to abandon tighter monetary policy, as waning U.S. economic momentum reduced inflationary pressures. In this environment, Canadian money-market yields fell alongside U.S. interest rates.

The portfolio manager continued to manage the Fund based on the assumption that BOC would at some point cut interest rates. However, this positioning did not offer the opportunity to obtain the extra yield that usually comes with a preference for longer-term securities, as longer-dated yields were mostly equal to short-term yields. The Fund's asset allocations were little changed, with provincial paper continuing to provide better yields relative to federal paper. Accordingly, the Fund was mostly invested in provincial obligations, with some floating-rate notes. The so-called flat yield curve has forced more investments into shorter-dated assets.

Many major central banks appear primed to lower interest rates and more generally stimulate borrowing in support of economic growth. The Canadian economy, in contrast, appears to be holding up relatively well, making it unlikely, in the view of the portfolio manager, that the BOC will cut rates anytime soon. But it is also fairly certain, in the view of the portfolio manager, that policymakers will not be raising short-term rates anytime soon. Accordingly, the portfolio manager is assuming an outlook in which yields will be pressured downwards and investors do not get adequately compensated for investing in longer-term instruments.
