Commentary as at June 30, 2019

Asian stock markets rebounded sharply during the six-month period from steep losses at the end of 2018, as equity valuations became more attractive and the economic backdrop improved. The U.S. Federal Reserve (the "Fed") refrained from making further rate hikes, allowing other central banks to loosen their own monetary policies. Meanwhile, financial markets benefited somewhat from increased optimism that the U.S. and China would resolve their trade dispute and from a shift by China toward more monetary stimulus. On a regional basis, China and Australia outperformed the rest of the region while South Korea, Taiwan and Indonesia underperformed.

Japanese equity markets posted solid gains in the first half of 2019, recovering from declines in the fourth quarter of 2018, when valuations hit one of their lowest levels since 2012. Trade uncertainty has slowed Chinese exports and capital expenditures significantly, and less robust domestic economic data and concerns about labor-market strength bolster the case for fiscal and monetary stimulus. Elsewhere, the Fed's change in tone on the economy in recent months and signs that Sino-U.S. trade tensions will dissipate make for a somewhat more positive outlook for Asian financial markets. However, the portfolio manager expects further volatility beyond the near term as many trade issues are seemingly intractable.

The portfolio manager continues to believe that the earnings capability of Japanese companies has improved significantly in recent years, driven by improved corporate governance and a bigger focus on a more efficient use of capital. As an example, many Japanese companies are now stressing stock repurchases, boosting earnings-per-share growth and returns on equity during a period when investment returns are muted.
