Commentary as at June 30, 2019

Canadian fixed-income markets rallied during the first half of 2019, as expectations of slowing global economic growth and the intensifying U.S.-China trade dispute spurred bond buying by domestic and international investors alike. Against this backdrop, the IMF twice lowered its projections for global growth. The U.S. Federal Reserve's (the "Fed") commitment to tighter monetary policy came under sustained attack from both investors and President Trump, as a lack of resolution to the trade dispute led to intensified concerns about the sustainability of the U.S. expansion. Lower inflation and expectations that it would slow even more fueled calls for the Fed to reconsider its planned path to higher interest rates, and the Fed did appear headed for an interest-rate cut if warranted.

In Canada, the economy showed signs of recovery after a slow start to the year, with strong labour markets and pick-ups in consumer optimism and housing. However, bond yields declined in Canada as inflation pressures retreated and global concerns predominated.

In this environment of sharply falling government yields, the portfolio manager bumped up exposure to non-government assets as relative valuations improved, and as government yields fell further below the cost of overnight funding. The portfolio manager positioned the Fund such that significant swings in interest rates would not have an excessively large impact on performance and on the assumption that overall interest rates would come down.

Many major central banks appear primed to lower interest rates and more generally stimulate borrowing in support of global economic growth, which shows signs of weakening. While the Canadian economy appears to be holding up relatively well, short-term Canadian yields are anticipating U.S. monetary easing. Whatever the case, it is fairly certain, in the view of the portfolio manager, that policymakers will not be raising short-term rates anytime soon. The portfolio manager therefore expects lower yields overall and smaller premiums on non-government securities in the short term.
