Commentary as at June 30, 2019

U.S. equity markets rallied in the first half of 2019, largely as a result of optimism that the U.S. Federal Reserve would lower short-term interest rates and growing optimism that a trade agreement between the U.S. and China would be reached. The S&P 500 Index had faced heightened volatility during May as trade negotiations between the U.S. and China appeared to fall apart, but the volatility subsided after U.S. President Trump and Chinese President Xi indicated that they would work toward a resolution.

Security selection in the Consumer Staples and Communication Services sectors contributed to relative performance. An overweight position in Air Products & Chemicals boosted returns after the chemicals company reported strong quarterly results. An overweight position in Danaher contributed to returns after the company acquired General Electric's biopharmaceuticals business at what the portfolio manager considers an attractive price.

Security selection in the Communication Services sector contributed to overall performance. However, the Fund's overweight position in Alphabet held back returns after the company reported first-quarter revenue that was lower than expectations, prompting fears that internet advertisers were starting to shift spending to competitors. In the portfolio manager's view, Alphabet continues to have the potential for continued ad growth.

Stocks are likely to rise modestly over the next year, in the view of the portfolio manager, but there are several scenarios that could lead to a different outcome. Stock gains may be more robust if the economic expansion lasts through 2021, which would likely depend on interest-rate cuts by the U.S. Federal Reserve, the resolution of the U.S.-China trade dispute and a re-accelerating Chinese economy. Alternatively, global growth would continue to slow if the trade rift widens, corporate earnings continue to fall and rising geopolitical risks cause investors to reduce valuations for equities and other risky assets.
