Commentary as at June 30, 2019

Emerging-market equities posted gains during the first half of 2019, although they underperformed developed markets. The year began on a positive tone as emerging-market stocks recovered in January from declines in late 2018. That was followed by several flat months as earnings estimates fell, notably in the technology sectors, after disappointing results for hardware and software companies. A breakdown in trade talks between China and the U.S. in May led to renewed pressure on emerging-market equities given that many emerging markets are dependent on Chinese manufacturers for a significant share of their trade.

The Fund's returns were negatively affected overall by stock selection and sector allocation. Performance was held back by exposure to Sri Lanka, which experienced a major terrorist attack during the period, while stocks from South Korea and India had a positive effect. At the sector level, the Fund benefited from stock selection in the Real Estate sector, offset by weak stock selection in Materials and Information Technology.

Individual stocks that aided performance included China Overseas, a property-management firm that posted faster-than-expected growth, and Bajaj Holdings, an Indian financial company. Among holdings that had a negative impact on the Fund's returns was Hatton National Bank, which declined in line with Sri Lanka's equity market and financial sector following the Easter Day terrorist attack in April.

There are a couple of reasons to be cautiously optimistic about emerging-market equities. One is attractive valuations. Another reason to be positive is that emerging-market currencies look cheap at the moment, an important consideration because currency and equity markets in emerging markets tend to move in the same direction. In the longer term, the big question is: where we are in the economic cycle that started when emerging-market equities bottomed at the beginning of 2016.
