Commentary as at June 30, 2019

During the first six months of the year, the portfolio manager allocated all of the Fund's assets to money-market instruments paying higher yields than U.S. Treasury bills, including U.S.-dollar-denominated corporate notes, bank-sponsored asset-backed commercial paper and bankers' acceptances. The Fund also had a small allocation to corporate short-term floating-rate notes, which provide payments that adjust to changes in short-term interest rates, and U.S.-dollar-denominated fixed and floating-rate notes issued by Canadian provinces.

The U.S. Federal Reserve (Fed) took a pause from raising the federal funds rate in the first half of 2019, ending the year with a target range of 2.25 – 2.5%. As a result, the short-end of the U.S. yield curve has remained anchored and the curve has become inverted at certain points. This means that the relative return for holding longer dated government securities has decreased. However, longer maturity corporate notes continue to provide attractive incremental yield, which the Fund captures through an allocation to longer-than-benchmark maturities. This strategy contributed to relative performance in the period.

The re-escalation of global trade tensions, the decelerating pace of global economic growth, and trepidation over the increasingly mature business cycle were all contributing factors to the decline. In the United States, the economic outlook reflects ongoing uncertainty surround trade negotiations with China and the effects that tariffs will have on the economy. At the same time, economic data has been quite strong according to recent job creation figures and inflation has been close to the 2% target. Market expectations have shifted strongly in favour of lower rates, and investors are pricing in a 0.75% decrease in the federal funds rate before the end of 2019. The portfolio manager is less certain that policy rates will fall so far so fast, but is not ruling out decreases if trade tensions continue to create economic uncertainty.
